

While the segment describing how she deals with people who question her choice of remaining childless is drawn out and lacks depth, one joke stands out. Upon hearing that she doesn't want children because they're expensive, her father said, "Your mum and I brought you up on practically nothing."

Upon relaying which Vaz retorts, "Yeah, and I fucking hated it." Vaz is definitely at her very best when she draws on her family for inspiration. Her unseen husband Deepak is mimicked to hilarious effect in and out of the bedroom.

Of course, Vaz spares no one in her politically incorrect monologue, taking pot-shots at people from Rahul Gandhi to her friend Swati. She addresses socially relevant issues like ageism, sexism, tradition, weight, coitus and more in her characteristic bawdy humour. The American references to car washes and dollar amounts only slightly take away from proceedings, with Vaz being, for the most part, relatable and accessible. The icing on the cake was her father. Seated in the auditorium, he was referenced as bearing a resemblance to her genitalia and he still owned up to his identity when Vaz called out to him at the conclusion of the show.
